Ask Doctor Brothers

By Dr. Joyce Brothers

DAUGHTER DRESSES LIKE HIPPIE; IT'S PART OF GROWING UP

Dear Dr. Brothers: My 16-year-old daughter has a closet full of lovely clothes but she insists on dressing like a hobo most of the time. Her favorite outfit is one of her brother's old shirts, faded blue jeans, and an old necktie used as a belt. It embarrasses me to be seen with her but she says I'm being old fashioned and fussy to expect her to get dressed up to go shopping.—L.K.

MANY PARENTS SUFFER

Dear Mrs. K.: Parents who provide their teen children with ample means of dressing well have difficulty understanding the fondness of their offspring for the "rag bag look." They can't understand why anyone would prefer wearing old, worn clothing instead of new, fashionable attire. They even suspect a perverse attempt on the part of their children to deliberately humiliate them by intimating to the world that their parents don't provide for them adequately.

Young people tend to be conformists in dress, but conformists, to their standards, not necessarily those of their parents.

The current fad for the piece-meal, studiously careless style of dress among high school and college students upsets adults who seem to see the laxity in dress as indicative of some overall moral degeneration, as if cleanliness and neatness were determinants of "good" character.

PART OF GROWING UP

There is a certain amount of rebelliousness in the adolescents' tendency to choose clothing his parents do not approve of. It's his way of expressing his desire to be different from them, to be independent of their standards of behavior as well as dress.

In another sense, the deliberate disregard for conventional standards of proper dress may arise from a desire to demonstrate egalitarianism. Many young people proclaim their distaste of clothing as an indicator of status, saying that they prefer to express their individuality by the imagination and flair with which they wear their clothing. Instead of the amount of money they are able to spend. They see their highly informal style of dress as proof of their lack of pretension. Also, as sociologist Erving Goffman points out, such extreme attention to clothing may be a way of symbolizing the wearers' exclusion from ordinary expectations of behavior. Dr. Goffman uses the terms "lightness" and "looseness" to contrast the effect and meaning of relatively formal and informal clothing.

The man wearing a suit and tie is expected to behave with a certain decorum while the man in a work shirt and trousers is freer to "let himself go," for example, lounge against a wall.

SHE CRACKS YOUR IMAGE

Your embarrassment at your daughter's appearance may arise from your perception of her dress as a contradiction to the image you wish to present to other people. If you see yourself as a respectable, conventional person who abides by accepted standards of dress and behavior, your daughter's slipshod appearance is incompatible with your feelings of self-respect, as you probably see your daughter as an extension of yourself.

A recent study by Dr. Andre Modigliani connected the tendency to become embarrassed in social situations with the individual's feelings of inadequacy.

People who have a shaky confidence in their own social worth and esteem may be overly sensitive to supposed criticism of their behavior. In reality, those people you feel you are giving a bad impression may be indifferent to your daughter's dress or, if they have adolescent children of their own, they

YOUR DENTAL HEALTH

Porcelain Fillings Have Their Drawbacks

By WILLIAM LAWRENCE, D.D.S.

DEAR DR. LAWRENCE: I have so many silver fillings in my teeth that my friends say I have a coal miner's smile. Can these black fillings be replaced with porcelain?—William H.

ANSWER: "Porcelain" filling materials (really silicate cements—not porcelain) can't be used to repair biting surfaces of back teeth because they wear so quickly. And they can't be used to repair edges of teeth because they have no "edge strength."

But facings of silver fillings can be replaced with porcelain. On nonbiting surfaces, and protected on all sides, porcelain can produce a pretty fair cosmetic effect even if for a limited time.

DEAR DR. LAWRENCE: My porcelain fillings wear away and discolor. They look good for a few months and then get brown and pitted, making my teeth look as though I never brush them. How can this be prevented?—A. F.

ANSWER: None of the porcelain filling materials in use today are any good. They stain and erode, their surfaces become rough and attract food debris, and they often cause irritation and inflammation of surrounding gums.

What a flurry of excitement there was some years ago when plastic filling materials for front teeth were introduced! But, alas, they didn't live up to their high promise.

Severe drawbacks were quickly noted. Mainly they didn't adhere well to cavity walls and, even when inserted with proper undercoating, sometimes permanently injured the nerve.

So most dentists continue to use "porcelain" and try to overcome, in part at least, the obvious difficulties by using good techniques, mixing, placing and polishing fillings with great care and, when possible, preparing cavities from behind the front teeth so that the fillings won't show.
